5. A road to self-realization Nothing in life is certain. As days go by, I take a deep breath and recollect the memories of what would have been. What would have been if I had continued down the same path, the path that would lead me to an unfulfilling end? What would have been if I had accepted the offer for a job that I disliked? It all started a while back. On the course to complete my degree, I needed a stamp of certification from any software company that was willing to hire me for twelve weeks as an intern. During the time of lockdown, it was extremely rare finding a job. I was like a crow in the parching heat searching for a few drops of water. Days went by, weeks went by and I was a frustrated figure trying anywhere and everywhere. Then came a glimmer of hope. A company would hire me as a quality assurance intern. The decision to take a job that I had no idea of whatsoever, was difficult considering I had spent my college years coding and developing software. I am not going to lie, the first few days were good, excellent even. I was working from home, given some responsibilities and I had their trust. It felt like I was learning something new. I wondered whether this was what I wanted in the long run. As days went by, I felt a sense of nothingness. I was a piece in a jigsaw puzzle that had already been solved. I would do what was required of me and nothing more. I didn't feel complete at all. I somehow managed to complete the twelve weeks and even got a job offer from the company with a high paying salary. This is when I made a resolution with my inner self. No matter what, I would not indulge myself in anything that would dislike for the sake of money. The real deal began now, to search for a job that would be a part of. After months of searching, I lastly luck smiled on me. I had been shortlisted as a candidate for scientific research. I went into the interview with a sense of anxiety and walked out with a grin on my face. In my head, I concluded, "This is what I was searching for all along." I recounted my university memories and remembered every research I had been a part of and I felt happy knowing this is what I wanted to do. One thing I failed to realize earlier is that you might be content with the things you are doing but are you really happy or just pretending. As I walk into my job now, I know I can make a difference. Everything that I do amounts to something larger. I can sleep well at night knowing I am doing something I care about. Nothing in life is certain, but I know this is for certain.
