Mental Health De-stigmatization A deep-rooted stigma persists in South Asian countries, especially in Bangladesh regarding mental health. Unaware of the severity of these issues, people often neglect or deem them negligible. Ignorance coupled with the existing stigma and fear of defamation exacerbates their conditions. This eventually worsens their situation beyond repair. Had these issues been addressed properly in the past, their quality of life would have been far better. The reluctance of majority to recognize mental health issues as a matter of consideration, let alone take measures against it has added insult to injury. The tendency to stifle feelings, to sweep them under the rug will have grave ramifications in their lives. In an age of online abuse, peer pressure, insurmountable amount of stress, tension, anxiety & depression, de-stigmatizing and normalizing mental health issues have become a crying need of time. To make matters even worse, COVID-19 pandemic has convoluted the conundrum. Mental health specialists now fear a global pandemic is bound to have mental repercussions. The rise of death tolls, the loss of jobs, the dreadful loneliness, all have affected our psyche in ways unimaginable and unprecedented. According to Lancet medical journal, the number of deaths by suicide is on the rise. So now we face the conundrum, "Is a mental health pandemic following the COVID-19?" It's high time we took steps against this invisible enemy. From a socioeconomic perspective too, it is becoming increasingly important to take care of our mental health with every possible way. In developing countries like Bangladesh, de-stigmatization is realistically a far-fetched dream given the circumstances. According to National Mental Health Survey 2018-2019, about 17% adults of the total population have a diagnosable mental health condition. That makes up almost 2 crore people. Surprisingly, 92% of them are fail to reach out for help. On the other hand, 13.6% children also suffer, 94% without treatment. The root cause behind this alarming situation, is the stark contrast between physical and mental health services. Even in this day and age, mental health problems are still subject to denunciation and criticism. Besides the acute lack of mental health specialists and clinicians also play a major role. Breaking through the stigma is no easy feat. Comprehensive and circumstantial groundwork has to be laid for its eradication. Meticulous and intensive efforts are essential too. Firstly, people irrespective of their age, culture, cast and creed must be educated in mental health issues. Everyone has to be made aware of the gravity of the situation at hand. Secondly, to speak of their problems, to express their sufferings must be normalized. The archaic superstitions have to be discarded and create a less hypercritical society. Thirdly, proper psychiatric care has to be assured and ensured; and everyone must have access to it. With proper implementation of such programs, we may hope to break the shackles of stigma and head towards a collective goal that will ensure mental health.
