Topic no. 05: A training program that introduces a new me to myself. In 2019, when I was at the beginning of the 7th semester of my undergraduate study, we had to attend a compulsory training program according to our curricula. We went to the "Training Institute for Chemical Industries" for 3 weeks training program. Before that, our teachers warned us that the program would be tough for us. So we all were well prepared. As it was a short duration training program, we had to complete a vast syllabus within that short period and that had imposed tremendous pressure on us. During the program, we had to attend some theoretical classes from 8 AM to 1 PM. Then the lunch break was for 1 hour long. And again had to attend Lab class from 2 PM to 4 PM. After finishing lab classes, we had a 1-hour long library session for further study. Almost every day, there were exams on the topics of the previous days. We were there far from our home, our university, our known teachers, and our comfort zone in a very tight schedule with a huge syllabus to complete. On those days, I found myself studying vigorously for the next days' exam after coming back to my hostel. I used to review the theoretical topics I had learned in the morning, searching articles on the internet for clearing concepts and planning for the next days' lab works. I was surprised to see myself working restlessly and not even feeling tired. Instead, I discovered myself asking questions to my teachers, solving problems, and leading my teammates in the laboratory work. It was difficult but I found it interesting and engaging as well. Finally, my hard work, commitment, and dedication paid off. I earned A+ and stood first among all the students. Here the question is, what was the achievement of this program? That awesome result? Being first among all students? No! Not at all. At this point, I have to share something about myself. Though I was a good student according to my teachers from the beginning of my school, I failed to keep pace with my undergraduate study. In my first 2 semesters, I scored very low. Every day I was trying to improve myself and working hard for that. But my scores were not improving satisfactorily. I was losing all of my confidence that I had gained through my whole school life. It was frustrating but I never gave up. I kept running the good race. The training program was an opportunity to prove myself. I accepted the challenge and I won. I won myself. I found a brand new me who became more mature, mentally strong, and knows how to deal with life. I have no awards to show for my self-esteem, my regained self-confidence, my leadership ability which was unknown to me throughout my whole life. But these achievements are beyond any academic distinction.
